Esophageal cancer: quantitative and qualitative inter- and intraobserver studies on videofluoroscopic swallowing-tactile swallowing correlation. A previous study reported that swallowing could be imitated by palpation and that the esophageal transit time could be measured by videofluoroscopy and by manometry. The present work is a quantitative and qualitative inter- and intraobserver study on videofluoroscopic swallowing and tactile swallowing correlation, performed on 21 esophageal cancer patients with complete dysphagia. Two independent groups of observers estimated 50 swallows recorded by videofluoroscopy and 50 swallows by tactile stimuli in order to evaluate the mutual agreement between videofluoroscopic and tactile evaluations of swallowing: correlation coefficient, Bland-Altman diagrams, receiver operating characteristic (ROC) curves and ROC analysis. The extent of agreement between the two methods in each observer was assessed by the Spearman rank test and the Wilcoxon test. The evaluation of videofluoroscopy and tactile stimuli by each observer was also evaluated by the Wilcoxon test. The correlation coefficient and Bland-Altman diagrams show good agreement between the two methods. ROC curve analysis proves the usefulness of two simultaneously registered videofluoroscopic swallow sequences from each observer in the identification of a sensitive and accurate diagnostic cut-off. It also shows that intrarater and interrater agreement of videofluoroscopic evaluation was higher than intra- and interobserver agreement of tactile evaluation. Videofluoroscopy is a reliable method to detect and locate disturbances of upper esophageal sphincter opening, whereas tactile swallowing evaluation is not sufficiently accurate. This finding needs to be taken into consideration by clinicians in the management of esophageal cancer patients. and we gain a lot of credibility. “It’s so important that the network I will be on is very new and credible and has 570a42141b
