CT and MR imaging in and around the trigeminal, facial, and vestibular nerves. CT and MRI are essential tools in the evaluation of patients with facial or other cranial nerve symptoms. Diagnosis of various neoplastic, ischemic, or infectious processes can be accomplished with a CT or an MRI study, or both, using CT or MRI as an initial or complementary tool. A CT or an MRI study performed as an initial study may help rule out the diagnosis of acute stroke or an intracranial space-occupying lesion. It may also serve as an initial and complementary study to identify an intracranial space-occupying lesion, especially in the cerebellopontine angle or brainstem, so that it can be better characterized. CT or MRI performed as a follow-up study to a treated disease may serve as an assessment tool or a first-line study in case of recurrence of the disease, or in case of unexplained findings on clinical examination or imaging.
